Our Children

By M. Wickoff.

"Children cause a lot of trouble to their parents, don't they?" mused the university girl.

"But think of the pride and pleasure to them," ventured the freshman, hedging, as if delivering a moral precept.

"I don't know about that," doubtfully. "First the father and the mother try to drive the naughtiness out of them by spanking or moral suasion, according to whether their creed is allopathic or homeopathic, then they nurse them safely through measles, mumps, chickenpox and whooping cough; guide them along the flowery paths of learning, heeding them over the stumbling blocks of mathematics and spelling; throughout their little lives gently feeding them from the trees of knowledge of good and evil; just they be poisoned—well, after all that, the children leave them to go in search of the wonder of fame and fortune which awaits them somewhere, they are sure."

"The children never think of that side of it," mused the freshman girl; then added with hesitation: "Did your brother go west last night?"

"Yes," the other answered, blinking hard. "He thinks there is a fine opening for him, but father and mother are older and can't see things with his eyes—he seems so young and inexperienced to them. Somehow, father looked so old and feeble in comparison when he put his hand on the boy's shoulder and gave a few parting words of advice. Mother stood there smiling through her tears so that he might not know how much she cared. This morning I found her going through an old trunk which has in it broken toys and worn-out shoes, with an occasional abbreviated skirt or roundabout. I think that she never realized until last night that we were grown up. She looked up with a little smile as she saw me. I believe I liked it better when he came to me for everything he wanted; she said softly."

"As I was going down to the station the other night to meet a friend of mine," said the university girl, "I was greatly entertained by an old gentleman just ahead of me who had evidently objected, as I had to, to waiting for the car and had decided to walk. He was a little fat Santa Claus of a man with a round, cheery face that fairly shone with suppressed excitement. He seemed to know everybody and greeted all he met in the heartiest voice."

"How d'ye do, Mrs. Davies," he said, taking off his hat to a fashionably dressed lady. "My son? Yes, he's coming tonight—am on my way to meet him. Yes, indeed, he will be glad; a boy's mother always misses him the most. I suppose, Mer—thank you; same to you."
